Travels With Chap: From Siberia To Samarkand

Synopsis

An unconventional father and his equally unconventional son embark on a quirky and impulse driven trip across Asia, starting with back-packing along stunning Lake Baikal in Siberia and ending with explorations of the giant mosques of Samarkand in Uzbekistan. A playful narrative produces a most unusual travelogue and a tale of father and son having a whole lot of fun while reaffirming their bonds.

Mike is a retired Psychologist and sometime flamenco guitarist. With dual Canadian/American citizenship, he currently lives in Toronto. Ontario, occasionally traveling to New Orleans to visit his children and grand-children. Starting with no woodworking skills whatsoever, he is building a flamenco guitar replete with many false starts accompanied by strident invective.

Michael Munger's Travels with Chap is a thoughtful, refreshingly honest and wonderfully humorous and, at times, outlandishly zany journey of a middle-aged man traveling mostly backpack style with his adult son through a world largely devoid of the infrastructure of modern tourism, through the Silk Road and across Asia, Siberia, Uzbekistan and other regions once part of the former Soviet Union. Candid in its observations, but mostly gently acerbic in probing the bonds and the tensions, of course between father and son and those they encounter along way, the book eloquently reminds us that while life is short and fraught with risks any time you set off into the unknown, it can also be an affirming adventure when you're open to the beauty of the vast, alien diversity of the world, including the strangers upon whose kindness, inevitably, you depend upon to make it home again alive. --
