Octogenarian Lloyd appears unstoppable, authoring yet another tome, focusing this time on meadow gardening. His own glorious landscape at Great Dixter exemplifies ways to cultivate areas where grasses meld with irises and buttercups, clover and wild orchids. Buckley's lush photography captures glimpses of Dixter at its loveliest while also documenting a range of locales that show flowers brightening grassy swards, particularly in rural Hungary. Whether Lloyd is relating the history of Dixter's various meadow plantings or setting out to clarify the inherent differences in pastures, prairies, natural grasslands, and meadows, his masterful, seemingly boundless horticultural expertise and sharp wit will inspire readers to think about exciting possibilities. Lloyd provides instruction on how to create meadows in existing turf, or, if one is starting from scratch, stimulating the imaginations of adventurous gardeners with alluring contrasts between bedding designs and wild areas that enlarge upon aspects of beauty as well as biodiversity. Alice JoyceCopyright © American Library Association. All rights reserved
