Joseph DesJardins is a professor in the philosophy department at the College of Saint Benedict, Saint John's University in Minnesota.

An excellent primer on sustainable business ethics and how to apply the concepts of a triple bottom line to organizational decision-making. Desjardins develops his arguments well and gives a voice to those with different beliefs and approaches.

Decent quality, great for the price.

This book combines three relevant topics in one text. By combining the three topics (business, ethics and environment), the author can compare and contrast as well as discuss the interrelationships and interdependencies one to another. The type is pretty small, so there is more information than expected from looking at the size of the book.

read it and loved it for grad school.

Enjoyable read.

The author managed to postulate powerful persuasive arguments and conclusions (without seeming manipulative) by synthesizing and drawing on credible evidence and info derived from multiple complex disciplines and concepts. It is a supremely well composed collection of essays bolstered with examples, definitions and ethical reasoning. I read it for a graduate course, one of the few (I personally enjoyed) that actually made a difference on how I go about making more conscious and educated personal consumer choices and decisions; reinforced personal awareness and the global effects of collective behaviors and attitudes. There is so much more to learn from it (globalized trade, consumer and business roles/impacts on the environment, societies, political and public programs, overconsumption, sustainable development versus unrestricted growth, business social and environmental responsibility, a different view of minimal moral side-constraints to do good and prevent harm, effects on individuals and global-scope impacts, etc. etc.) Easy to read and grasp every critical issue and important point made throughout the book regardless of readers' educational background, degrees of knowledge/familiarity of the topics addressed or disciplines incorporated into the essays.
